Pure Power Technologies and United Auto Workers are playing a big part in bolstering the surrounding community via the Irvington Innovation Zone. This effort is making great strides to bring more jobs and businesses to the area in which the track resides. The redevelopment of properties and transformation towards neighborhoods are goals of this initiative as well. Other local organizations along with political and community leaders are working for these objectives too including future projects at the Bryant Heating and Cooling Indianapolis Speedrome®.

Pure Power Technologies LLC, a Navistar Company, is pioneering the next generation of clean engine control and emissions management solutions. That mission statement says it all as more and more people get involved in the future of this planet. Most Speedrome fans routinely drive past their Indianapolis facility just west of the track on Brookville Road. "We are very excited about joining up with our United Auto Worker friends to sponsor this amazing event", said the Director of Foundries at Pure Power Technologies Rick Bacon. "I can't wait to see all of the best Figure 8 drivers compete at the Speedrome for the world title in September".

Pure Power Technologies operates facilities in South Carolina, Kentucky, Wisconsin, and the aforementioned Indianapolis location. They design and manufacture fuel, air management, and after-treatment systems for diesel engines as well as ductile metal castings. This gives their customers a real, competitive advantage instead of piecing together systems from various suppliers. These key technologies are designed to work in sync. This integrated-system approach is unique in today's marketplace.

Like their products, their organization is vertically integrated, combining research and development, engineering, and manufacturing capabilities. Pure Power Technologies has a proven track record of solving complex thermal, mechanical, and hydraulic challenges, utilizing strong analysis, robust experimental data, and knowledgeable development in materials. That ability to coordinate and consolidate all of this expertise results in unsurpassed technological solutions for everyone.
